The answer to Is use of URL.getPath() considered good practice? seems to say that use of Class.getResource() is more proper and, while I could see that making sense in static/non-web-app contexts, there are occasions where we're forced to use Class.getResource(). For example, my JDK 6 / Guava code, which uses paths to look for network stream resources (due to Guava's support for MultipartInputStream, which unfortunately requires Java 6 (it doesn't work in Java 7)); try { if (this.isLocalFile()) { return FileSystem.class.getResourceAsStream(getFilePath()); } ... It will go away once we transition to Java 7 or older. So the idea of using Class.getResource() feels like a better solution; is this actually correct? Is there some reason to not use the Class.getResource() version of this? A: It's a bit risky to use Class.getResource() because it is system dependent, and you may not have the permissions to read the resource. You should go with the one from the API, Class.getResource(). A: It's more of a matter of preference. Class.getResource() can be much more prone to doing something unintended on different versions of JDK or running environments, where as getResource() will only be available for access on the specified classloader. So if you want to code with confidence, stick with getResource(). LIVE STREAMING PRIVATE LESSONS
