C-O-X/OSI Release TextmateTM 3.0 The latest release of OSX/Unix TextmateTM is here. Version 3.0 builds on the success of 2.0 with new features including UTF8 support, a robust text selection, and support for themes. New Features UTF8 Support TextMate supports UTF8, UTF16, and UTF32 when writing HTML files. This allows you to use fonts that were not available in the previous version. Text Selection TextMate has always supported selection of more than one line of text. With 3.0, you can easily drag across multiple lines and use the 'cut' command to select all of them. Themes TextMate has always supported themes, where you can choose which colors the editor uses. While this is completely transparent to the user, it is helpful to developers because it allows them to create themes and share them across machines. Themes are now supported on Mac OS X. Lucky for us, it only took them 4 years to get there (Textmate 1.5 was released in 2009). There is a TextMate 3 bundle available on the TextMate Bundle Page (iTunes required to use it). You can also grab the source and compile your own from it.Compare Homeowners Insurance Options: Health Insurance Coolidge, ID Are you looking for an affordable health insurance in Coolidge, ID? United Kingdom coalition A United Kingdom coalition, sometimes referred to as the coalition government or the Conservative-Liberal Democrat coalition, was the government of the United Kingdom formed by the Conservative Party and the Liberal Democrats after the 2010 General Election. The government shared power with the Democratic Unionist Party. Following the 2015 general election, the government was replaced by the Conservative–Liberal Democrat coalition and the Conservative Party led a minority government with the support of the Liberal Democrats. At the time of dissolution, the Coalition had a net approval rating of −23%. Prior to the formation of the Coalition on 9 May 2010, the Conservative Party and Liberal Democrats had been coalition partners in the Labour Government in the UK since the days of the merger of the Liberal Party with the Conservative Party in 1987. Formation Conservative-Liberal Democrat Coalition The Conservatives and Liberal Democrats had agreed a deal in December 2009 when David Cameron secured the position of leader of the Conservative Party following the death of Michael Howard. Cameron became Prime Minister on the condition that the Conservative party voted in favour of his leadership of the party. During the 2010 General Election, the Liberal Democrats agreed to support the Conservative Party in a coalition government in exchange for allowing Liberal Democrat peerages to be created in the House of Lords and Conservative peerages to be created in the House of Commons. During the first half of 2010, the Liberal Democrats were in talks with the Democratic Unionist Party about forming a coalition of the two parties in the House of Commons. The agreement between the two parties was announced on 4 May 2010. On the same day, Conservative Party leader David Cameron announced in the 2010 Conservative Party conference that he would lead a government of national unity which included both the Conservative Party and the Liberal Democrats, the DUP, and smaller parties. The new government was to include a fully formed government in Northern Ireland and legislation would be brought forward to replace the Trident nuclear weapons system. In addition, for the first time, since the Second World War, a government of a minority party was able to implement some of its policies in England, in Northern Ireland, and in Scotland. At the time of dissolution, the Coalition had a net approval rating of −23% while its predecessor had a net approval rating of −12%. Terms The Coalition agreed to abide by the 'Coalition Agreement', a set of agreed rules that govern the relationship between the Conservative Party and the Liberal Democrats. The four main issues that had to be resolved were:
