There seems to be a lot of information about anxiety, and a lot of research on its prevention. The trouble is that when people talk about it, it seems to mean a situation where the person has been feeling awful, but doesn't really feel like their problems are actually bad (e.g. it's just the normal ups and downs of life). When I was a young teenager I felt really anxious, but like a normal student, not like a hypochondriac. I always felt, and in retrospect, it really was, that this was part of a normal life (and of course it wasn't at the time). In the past few years, though, I've become much better at managing my anxiety, and the effect is great. There is now a lot of fear in my life, but it's a fear that I recognise as anxiety, and can explain as a fear that I may be harming myself. Sometimes I wonder if the anxiety I have isn't something I should be proud of (if a lot of people didn't experience it, there would be some worrying problems), or if it really is a complication that will always hang around. I don't want to say the anxiety problem is worse or more serious than it was, because I don't think it was (except that it took a little longer to give me enough warning to prevent it). A: "Anxiety-Free" is certainly a real thing. You can be free from anxiety, but you can't be
