The purposes of this study were to identify the diagnoses most frequently used in medical records, to describe the decision-making process in order to develop hospital nursing diagnoses, and to analyze the changes that occur in these diagnoses over time. The sample consisted of medical records of patients admitted to a tertiary hospital in the metropolitan area of the city of São Paulo (Southeastern Brazil) between September 1999 and August 2000. Data were collected from medical records of all inpatients, totaling 17,983 records. Nurses' practice records were analyzed using content analysis and the opinion of a nursing expert who elaborated the nursing diagnoses from the sample records. We identified 93 nursing diagnoses in the records. Organizational diagnosis, a lack of preparedness, and a lack of equipment were the most frequently reported nursing diagnoses. In the medical record, definitions of signs and symptoms, laboratory and functional test findings, and key words were found. The medical record and nursing practice observations were included in most of the reports. In conclusion, we observed that, in the medical records, data were organized in a systematic way. The most frequently used nursing diagnoses were related to organizational characteristics and lack
