A fragment of a buried human skull found last week in the Maine woods would be the oldest human remains to be discovered in the state, University of Maine anthropologists said Tuesday. The complete skeleton found in Belgrade during the Maine-New Hampshire Hurricane Sandy recovery effort likely is between 9,000 and 11,000 years old, said Jayne Thompson, a University of Maine archaeologist and paleoanthropologist. The find is part of a series of human remains found in the same general region since the mid-1990s that are becoming increasingly well-dated, allowing scientists to get a more precise age for the head, she said. "If that is correct, it is the oldest individual of its kind in Maine," she said. It is probably from an early farmer or hunter-gatherer but was buried in a way that kept it safe, likely under a protective structure such as a stone, she said. It was removed from the ground, placed in a stretcher and transported by truck to the University of Maine, where it was cleaned and is undergoing testing in the laboratory. DNA analysis is being performed to establish gender, ethnicity and ancestry, which is expected to provide a birth date and other characteristics about the individual. It would be the oldest human remains found in the state since a child's skull found in the 1920s at the Old Bull Sucker site at Jordan Pond, southeast of Rangeley, Thompson said. “That was a child. This is an adult,” she said. University of Maine anthropologist Emelie Kivisild, the state’s principal investigator on the project, said the skeleton will be wrapped in plastic
