Years of experience in the field of dentistry. Knowledge, talent, and years of experience in dentistry are fundamental requisites to being a successful dentist. Although a variable that is difficult to quantify, increasing experience and number of years practicing dentistry have been shown to correlate with high quality dentistry. The duration of time in dental practice is an extremely important factor. However, a review of the literature demonstrated that the longevity of dental practitioners, while growing in number, is not as desirable as one would assume. An increased incidence of serious medical problems, often affecting the cardiovascular system, have been linked to increased patient and physician exposure to the stress and pain induced by multiple dental procedures. Improvements in our methods of dental management may be made through the implementation of implant technology and the discovery of new scientific therapies. Clinicians must be encouraged to improve their methods of treatment by taking advantage of more efficient methods of dental management. Further research should be conducted to reveal the effects of the various stressors currently employed by dentists on practitioners' health. Finally, there needs to be a greater emphasis on extending the average years of dental practice to be worthy of the respect granted in society.
