At the year's start, news outlets in the region were buzzing about the new law that comes to be known as SB14. When reading this law, there's a section that said: "Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a public school student's test scores and records shall not be released to any agency, reporter, or other individual or entity, if the student takes an examination for the purpose of recertification of the student's teacher certification." The Maine Department of Education sent out a press release on June 4, announcing that all schools will be receiving "a new and powerful technology tool." Maine teachers embrace new technology as effective, during last fall's training in Waldoboro. Education Commissioner Stephen Bowen said, "This new technology will help create a more efficient, proactive, and complete system for student data. This system will help us provide better support for students, teachers, and families. With it, we will be able to deliver services more precisely and efficiently, and it will transform our administrative processes."
