Business,.Alternative processes of cyclodextrin-induced chemical evolution and biomass production in wastewater treatment--fate of biomass products in wastewater. This paper describes the degradation of cyclodextrin (CD) and the conversion of soluble/insoluble-CD-converted-products (SCDPs/ICDPs) of CD-conversion processes (herein referred to as CD-F) to the cellular growth and bioflocculants in wastewater (WW) treatment. Ten microcosms were set up with WW and CD to assess the biodegradation of CD and CD-F-induced cell growth and bioflocculant production. In terms of biodegradation, CD was slowly degraded over a long incubation time, and the degradation rate in the last ten days was higher than that in the first 30 days. Three stages of biodegradation were observed. In terms of cell growth and bioflocculants production, biomass was produced in CD-F-containing samples in all 10 microcosms. The bioflocculant yield varied between 0.19 and 0.50 g of polysaccharide per kg of initial CD. The yield increased from the first 40 days and leveled off at the 90-120-day period. The increase of the bioflocculant yield was consistent with the emergence and disappearance of the SCDP/ICDP in the WW system. The recovery rate of SCDP/ICDPs was between 18.82% and 56.10%, but the yield was 1.41-1.74 times the yield of SCDP/ICDPs. The yield of SCDP/ICDPs in the form of cells varied between 0.50% and 11.91%, whereas that of SCDP/ICDPs in the form of bioflocculants was much higher (1.45-2.42 times) than that of SCDP/ICDPs. We thus confirmed that CD-F degradation products can be used as a source of biomass and bioflocculants in the treatment of wastewater.Q: spring property placeholders (optional arguments) The following snippet configures a "search engine" / "registry" for domain objects:
