Home : "Scoped service vs global service in Google Cloud Messaging" I have a Cloud Service with a single function that receives push notifications. This function is called multiple times throughout the day (once every few seconds) to verify that a user still wants to be pushed an item. I've been reading up on the subject of how different service instances should communicate with each other. According to the Google documentation, it says: Scoped services can be created in an environment scoped_environment. Scoped services can also be created in a service account, which has domain-wide delegation. The scoped service instances communicate through the Google Compute Engine API. Now, I want to use a single push notification service for all of my Android devices (like PushBullet). However, that service would need access to ALL of my device's tokens which is not possible. However, there seems to be no way around having to send each of my devices their own unique token. It would be possible to have a service that generates the tokens on-the-fly but this seems to be against the purpose of having a Scoped Service. What should I be doing? Should I be scoping my Push Service to a single instance of the service (with the smallest of scopes) and creating a single instance of the Push Service for the entire environment? A: You have to have a single instance of the service. In the documentation, they mentioned that scoped services are intended for the instances to share information. In your case, the functionality you want
