You can get it from both sources, but if you get it from the link we provided, you won't need to buy any other additional tools (unless you need other tools to use this one).Q: Subclassing NSObject gives an error on the init? I'm trying to do something like this: @interface Subclass : NSObject { NSInteger *day_array; NSInteger number_of_days; } @property (nonatomic, retain) NSInteger *day_array; @property (nonatomic, assign) NSInteger number_of_days; - (Subclass *)initWithDayNumber:(NSInteger)number_of_days; @end @implementation Subclass @synthesize day_array, number_of_days; - (Subclass *)initWithDayNumber:(NSInteger)number_of_days { self.day_array = malloc(sizeof(NSInteger) * number_of_days); self.number_of_days = number_of_days; return self; } - (NSInteger *)valueAtDay:(NSInteger)day { return day_array[day]; } @end After compilation, the compiler gives this error (for the init method): initWithDayNumber:day: line: No matching method found to override! I'm using gcc -arch i386 A: The error is pretty self-explanatory; the initWithDayNumber:day: method does not (and cannot) exist in the base class. It's not a valid method signature for an initializer in any class. The compiler does know that this is an init method, because it is overriding an init method inherited from NSObject and you tell it to with the @implementation Subclass... @end... @interface Subclass... @end syntax. Instead of overriding, use a category method. There are many good reasons to do this, but with just these two types of methods, the biggest reason is performance. Methods are called by pointer arithmetic; method call time is quite expensive (from a scalar standpoint). By doing it in a category, instead of needing to override the 6d1f23a050
