Since Photoshop is still a $1,200 full-version studio program, you might be wondering why you would buy it if you don't need all of its features. The answer isn't black and white. You do need some subset of Photoshop for your job. The software overhaul began with a new color engine offering much improved Soft Proofing and Color-Echoing. Both have been improved on in the latest iteration. The Workflow panel has received a big upgrade. A new Feed panel offers a user interface for Instagram and Facebook for accessing photos from the social media platform. The save system is all new with a number of new options for long-term file-saving. Creative Cloud has been restyled, giving it a more "smart-app" look and feel. One of the new features is Project Boundaries, a design feature. I've been a long time user of Photoshop, so I took a long look at the newest Photoshop CS6. First I want to point out the new color engine in this version is very much like what we saw in Lightroom 5.0. In this version it is called Neat and Accurate. This new image engine offers improved results in Soft Proofing and color ech'ing. The whole workflow and interface of this new engine is clearly focused on interfacing with Lightroom. Personally, I love Lightroom and was disappointed to see this new engine take much of the same interface. I wish I was able to shave a few cycles off with this new engine. I don't expect this to happen any time soon. My biggest issue is that I am pretty strongly against the concept of integrating studio and desktop versions of a product. For starters, the Photoshop needs to be the best possible tool for the job even if the user insists on using it on a laptop. Secondly, the speed at which the studio and desktop versions talk to each other on version control is lacking and the results are little to none. In this version they started on this issue, but they just aren't there yet. This is a serious problem for Lightroom as it is part of the Adobe Creative Suite and for Photoshop is part of the Photoshop product group. This is a problem for Adobe as they continue to confuse issues. I am not sure if this decision to bring those two versions closer together was made in haste or not. Having to use my iPad instead of my desktop for my desktop application for my design work is not something I would find easy to do or quickly move to.
