Photos look more realistic than ever before thanks to content-aware blending (CAB) in this full-featured entry-level program. CAB works with a professional-grade pipeline and AI technology, Sensei, to intelligently identify and automatically blend an image's new or changed content with its existing content. The result is an image that looks instantly more realistic — almost as if the picture was shot by a camera. CAB improves the appearance of an image by seamlessly blending its structures and objects with everything else that's in the photo. Even in those cases where objects are not visible, CAB works to automatically fill in the image to create the appearance of a completely new subject. The feature is fully integrated into Adobe Photoshop CC and Adobe Photoshop Lightroom, as well as Elements. Another new CAB feature in Elements is face detection. In addition to simply detecting faces in photos, Photoshop Elements can automatically suggest faces that may be of interest in each batch of images; for example, it can automatically find the heads in large group shots. In addition to releasing Photoshop on tablets, the well-known company also brought the app to Apple Watch, Apple TV, iPod touch, iPad, and Mac. Many big companies rely on Photoshop to facilitate brand marketing and advertising. Now customers can take a photo on their wrist and edit it immediately on iPhone, Android, iPad, and Apple TV. However, the app doesn't have full-featured features that can replace Photoshop for high-level work. Photoshop users should still consider the mobile version of Adobe's professional application for editing large projects.

"With the latest rate of innovation, Photoshop matters more than ever before," said Shantanu Narayen, president and CEO of Adobe. "It's the first place customers go to achieve the most ambitious visual results, such as helping artists create works of art, directors create movies, and professionals deliver stunning imagery. Seamless cloud collaboration makes it easier than ever to download, use and share projects from anywhere, ensuring that no matter when or where the magic happens, everyone can experience Photoshop." In "Share for Review," one person can invite colleagues to access, review and approve a project for in-depth collaboration in Photoshop. Once approved, the entire project history and content, including changes since the last review, is replicated across all users. Users can comment on most edits made to images, even if the original version remains unchanged, and the history of collaborative activity is always captured in the project's history. Collaborators can provide feedback, such as adding or removing an object or modifying an existing one, and apply their edits directly to the original image without having to return to the editor's workspace. One version of software, one data path. Adobe Sensei is a brand new partner to Photoshop Creative Cloud on macOS. It interprets and analyzes the human language of images and sketches, understanding that changes to your original content—such as deleting, clipping, repositioning—are often just words and strokes. These changes are applied invisibly and automatically, and Photoshop Creative Cloud can be accessed easily in meetings and on the go, offering instant, collaborative access to your edits on the desktop, in the web browser, on mobile, on connected devices and in Photoshop. In addition, all of the data in a Photoshop file is completely portable through machines, the web and other cloud services, or over HD-SDI, allowing you to use and edit digital assets anywhere, on any device, from upload to final delivery.
